Randlism: What You Need To Know

From PsyPost:

“Virtuous Victim Signaling” as a Dark Triad Strategy

A series of three studies with over 1,500 U.K. participants investigated “virtuous victim signaling,” a behavior where a person publicly highlights their suffering and moral character at the same time to gain sympathy and resources. Participants completed questionnaires measuring dark tetrad traits (narcissism, Machiavellianism, psychopathy, and sadism).

They also completed a scale measuring their tendency to engage in virtuous victim signaling. The third study introduced a new scale to measure the tendency to exploit accusations against others, such as by participating in public shaming or “canceling” them. The researchers controlled for factors that might predict actual victimhood, like poor health.

The first two studies confirmed that both narcissism and Machiavellianism are strongly linked to virtuous victim signaling. This suggests the behavior is a strategic tool for social influence rather than a simple reflection of genuine suffering. People high in these traits appear to use displays of victimhood and morality to manipulate others for personal gain.

The third study revealed a unique role for sadism. While sadism was not linked to signaling one's own victimhood, it was connected to the enjoyment of exploiting accusations against others. Individuals high in sadism reported deriving pleasure from shaming or canceling people, often under the guise of moral righteousness. This shows a different way dark traits can manipulate social dynamics.

Elevated Levels Observed Among Trump Supporters

Researchers conducted two large surveys with a total of over 9,000 U.S. adults to explore the psychological traits underlying political beliefs. Participants completed a range of questionnaires measuring attitudes toward Donald Trump, general political ideology, and various personality traits.

The personality assessments included measures of both "malevolent" traits (psychopathy, Machiavellianism, narcissism) and "benevolent" traits (humanism, faith in humanity). Participants also completed tests of empathy, which distinguished between feeling concern for others (affective empathy), understanding others' emotions (cognitive empathy), and enjoying others' suffering (dissonant empathy).

The findings consistently showed that people who rated Trump’s presidency highly were more likely to score higher on malevolent personality traits like psychopathy, narcissism, and Machiavellianism. These individuals also scored lower on benevolent traits, such as humanism and a belief in the basic goodness of others.

Support for Trump was also linked to specific empathy patterns. His supporters reported lower levels of affective empathy (less emotional concern for others’ suffering) and higher levels of dissonant empathy (greater enjoyment of others’ pain). These personality differences held up even when accounting for factors like age, gender, and education, suggesting a deep connection between these psychological dispositions and a particular political alignment.

The man my friend of forty years was last seen with, Thomas Wayne Randle has been observed to say he was sexually abused as a child - an allegation the woman he has forcefully cohabitated with for more than 25 years denies, observing it to be a ploy for advantage via sympathy or as a method of imparting a false sense of authority to a conversation. This is always done in the same stupid, oblivious manner in which all his actions are displayed. In this case, he would use the premise that since he was an abused child his opinions on sex, sexual functioning, gender identity, and equal rights are somehow more valid. This is done in a physically intimidating manner, with direct staring and elevated voice level as well as a forward-leaning movement to invade his perceived opponents' personal space.

I, in my habits, particularly enrage the ignorant child in his dysfunctional personality, as I have no sense of personal space and do not cringe at the nearness of another or the possibility I will be physically in contact with an unfamiliar person. I also argue with reasons explained fully in the outset of the premise, which not only reveals the foundations of my well-thought-out opinion initially for review, but, by virtue of this, reveal anyone else involved in the debate as not having included such material for group perusal. I also am not intimidated physically by anyone, especially by obese blobs who have hung their excess bags of flesh on frames that are taller than a high percentage of the population.

My body is the result of continuous and rigorous exercise over a lifetime, from both manual labor jobs and deliberate repeated movements. My body type is shared by, I have been informed by Patty's deceased Uncle Bobby - a boxing enthusiast - only 2% of the world's male population. My weight centers lower, making it extremely difficult to knock me down during a physical altercation. This is particularly important in boxing, as an opponent must win by TKO in a full ten rounds of fighting. Boxers hate getting punched, because the only persons who ever hit them are professional boxers. Ten rounds of this are not looked forward to as an activity of choice. Knocking an opponent to the ground is one of the main goals of an attacker, as it puts them at a distinct advantage. If one's target never falls down, it means they are spending 100% of their time with the intent of hurting or killing them. I had figured this out long before I had many beer-fueled conversations with Uncle Bobby, and it often shows, as I was born and continue to live in a state with some of the absolute dead last rankings of literacy and healthy anger management attributes. (Texas.) I am prepared always to prove my point as valid and well-informed and usually fucking genius with words or an attacker's eyeball in my hand.

Thomas Wayne Randle is a prime example of the median Republican - inept in every measurable way due to lack of effort. Spoiled coddled children who insist they own everything and everyone and use a fairy tale they have neither written nor adequately researched as a justification for this inexcusable worldview. Thieves who execute the inventors and exploit the new ideas, or at least attempt to, since they didn't bother to even look at the patent applications. Weakness personified, carrying guns to take down those who actually are more capable of causing physical harm than their lazy, untrained heaps of organic miasma could ever be. Cowards, every single one.

The very first sentence I ever spoke to this narcissistic abuser of life and time was spoken after observing him taking a prescription pill bottle from his pocket and ingesting some of the contents. Upon hearing his reasoning - that he was replacing his brain's dopamine levels that were lowered by his daily usage of cocaine - I informed him of the fact that dopamine pills are for a very different treatment of a much different medical condition and were not, in fact, doing any such thing. The only effect guaranteed to be produced from such an action was the ensured development of testicular cancer, the information which undoubtedly would have accompanied the legal purchase of such pills from a pharmacy, but since it was an additional offering of his cocaine dealer had, wisely from the seller's perspective, not been included. I spent much of my nineteenth year as a medical transcriptionist specializing in the University of Texas Health Science Center's cadaver lab lessons and am full of interesting little tidbits of data concerning the human body. For the record, a heart transplant is far more dangerous and complicated than a kidney or liver. It is one thing to stop the heart while fooling around with its neighbors, another level of complication to stop the heart, remove it, and drop in an aftermarket version, which you might as well, because the OEM you have as an option was not 'gently used'.

Yes, dear reader, you have correctly perceived the writer's technique of foreshadowing before your eyes. Sure enough, Thomas Wayne Randle has officially added balless to dickless and spineless. That is precisely why humans that have matured to the adult stage of their lives continuously scan for incoming data streams to compare with their personal repositories for validation and perhaps inclusion and actionable integration. Only the most infantile of children, those who only learned to walk without supports the previous day, dismiss information without proper investigation. It is noted that in nature, beings at this stage are extremely rare to find past this date of development that did not have the doting, full-time protective care of at least one parent, if not an entire ocean or savannah plain-filling herd of them.

There is no evidence Patricia Ann Roberts/Coffey/Dumas/Randle, 57, last seen in Lake Orion, Michigan is alive. Our last two phone calls lasted fifteen hours each, during which she told me he ripped apart their five tiny dogs and forced her to bake their carcasses on a cookie sheet and watch while he ate them.

No one will do anything.

If no one will, then I have to.

Please help.
